Poorly managed pain in people with Alzheimer's disease (AD) is a public health priority. The Monroe Lab uses observational studies to inform psychophysical and neurophysiological translational research in AD.

Dr. Monroe will briefly review findings from his lab that have informed his current program of research focused on mechanistic alterations in sensory and affective pain systems, with an evolving interest in descending pain modulation in AD.